Military Support for Civilian Law Enforcement

Ambiguities in the Posse Comitatus Act (18 U.S.C. 1385), which prohibits the use of military forces to "execute the laws," has deterred cooperation between the Department of Defense and civilian law enforcement agencies.

Both the House and Senate, therefore, have approved legislation (Sec. 915 of S. 815; Sec. 906 of H.R. 3519) expressly authorizing the Department of Defense to assist civilian law enforcement officials through sharing of information, lending of equipment and facilities, and training of civilian officials.

The House bill authorizes military personnel to assist federal law enforcement agencies in the operation of radar and related communications equipment as well as other equipment such as Naval vessels.

Although this legislation would facilitate appropriate cooperation between military and civilian authorities generally, its major purpose is to provide expanded military assistance in stemming the flood of illicit drugs pouring into the United States by sea and air.

As this is written, differences between the Senate and House bills must still be ironed out by a Conference Committee, but enactment of significant legislation expanding military support for civilian law enforcement appears virtually certain.

Death Penalty Legislation

In early July, S. 114, which would restore the death penalty at the federal level, was favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee by a 13 to 5 vote. As reported, the bill would authorize capital punishment for federal homicides, treason, and espionage. An amendment approved by the Committee would also permit the death penalty for an attempted assassination of the President.

Other amendments voted by the Committee included (1) a requirement that the government notify the defense prior to trial that the death penalty will be sought; (2) inclusion of a threshold finding of a defendant's substantial culpable involvement in a homicide before consideration of aggravating factors may proceed — a provision necessitated by the fact that most federal homicide offenses are phrased in terms of the felony-murder rule; (3) requiring that the jury be unanimous with respect to finding some aggravating factor, but not with respect to a single factor; and (4) a mandatory jury instruction prohibiting consideration of the defendant's race, creed, sex, or national origin in the sentencing determination.

While it is clear that there will be heated debate on this legislation when it is considered by the full Senate, it is believed that the bill's proponents have enough votes to secure passage in the Senate.

Bail Reform

Although there has been no action on any of the several bail reform bills introduced this year, Congressional interest in making substantial changes in the Bail Reform Act of 1966 seems to be increasing, particularly in the Senate.

To date, the most comprehensive bail reform proposal has appeared as a proposed amendment, offered by Senators Biden and Kennedy, to the Department of Justice authorization bill.

This proposal would permit pretrial detention under certain circumstances, limit the use of money bonds, and incorporate several changes in federal bail practice that were included in the Senate criminal code revision bill of the last Congress.

The Kennedy-Biden bail proposal was one of several Democratic criminal justice initiatives included in a package of proposed amendments to the authorization bill.

Attorney General’s Task Force on Violent Crime

It is expected that the Attorney General’s Task Force on Violent Crime will have completed Phase II of its work — recommendations for federal legislation to deal with the violent crime problem — by mid-August.

The Phase I recommendations of the Task Force, which concerned ways in which the federal government can immediately improve its efforts in addressing violent crime, were published in mid-June.

The Phase II recommendations of the Task Force, coupled with an anticipated major speech by the President on crime this Fall, are likely to generate legislative action on a variety of criminal justice issues.

A Sociological Approach
Randall G. Shelden,
University of Nevada-Las Vegas

In this complete sociological overview of the criminal justice system in America, Randall Shelden emphasizes throughout the social problems of today including class inequality, racism and sexism. The author includes a special section on women focusing on: women's prisons, police women, female delinquency and battered women. Not only does the text detail contemporary problems but it describes the historical development of these problems as well.

Shelden explores the major types of criminal behavior, including current topics such as corporate crime and violence against women with clarity and depth. His emphasis on the extra-legal factors—race, class, sex and the political climate in the U.S.—offer the reader the framework necessary to understand the criminal justice system in America.
