At this time in the history of criminology, science and law oppose each other in important ways. We hope to revisit old issues to show they are still with us today. Rather than resolving issues, the tendency has been to ignore them. We hope to highlight several major aspects of the science-versus-law debate, not to resolve them, but rather to open up some channels of communication for new dialogue. We will raise more questions than we answer.

The criminal justice system is caught up in a tension between criminology and criminal justice. The former is dedicated to the explanation of crime and to doing something about it in response to the explanations. The latter is dedicated to neither explanation nor explanation-based responses. Instead, criminal justice reflects an altogether different set of concerns: establishing “who done it” and responding with punishment, or, more broadly, with control. Although criminology and criminal justice overlap to a degree because of shared concerns, their centers of gravity are poles apart. Both have a claim to the criminal justice system, to what it does and why, but the values and practitioners of criminal justice are firmly in control. The claim of criminology is gaining strength, however, with the advances of scientific explanation. Yet, the tension continues and indeed grows stronger.

Science, out of its commitment to the “is-ness” of truth, is ready, willing, and (some would say often, others would say sometimes) able to do therapeutically what is possible.

The history of the debate goes back to the rise of Western philosophy, in Plato, Spinoza, Kant, Mill, and other great philosophers. Two basic positions have been maintained, one based on idealism, the idea that reason and not experience is the means to knowledge. The other position, as found in the British empiricists (Locke, Hume), taught that experience is the source of knowledge. The legal tradition borrows from the rationalists its concern for justice, freewill, and moral responsibility, whereas the scientific tradition borrows from the positivists its concern for biological, psychological and other explanations of human behavior. The legal position has

To the Editor:

I want to thank you for publishing Ernest van den Haag's presentation in the March/April 1991 issue of The Criminologist.

I am an advocate of the death penalty. In fact, I would readily execute all third time recidivists (felony recidivists).

Simply stated, to hell with warehousing criminal trash in prisons at taxpayer expense when you can get rid of such people forever.

Moreover, I consider that Criminology should concentrate more on Policing in lieu of persisting in dedicating an inordinate amount of time to sociological/social welfare oriented rat crap.

I further consider that Criminology should become more interdisciplinary in nature.

For example, I am profoundly involved with forensic science/criminalistics, etc.

As verification of the immediate foregoing, I have attached copies (withheld due to space limitations) of a status report from Col. Joe E. Milner of the Texas Department of Public Safety and a letter from Sigurd D. W. Whitley of the Home Office Forensic Science Service in London for your perusal.

With regard to counselors and counseling... you know as well as I do that the very best and most effective method of counseling recalcitrants (youth gang members, drug addicts, etc.) is with a Whipping Post and a Black Snake Whip — or a Cat-O-Nine Tails...

Cordially,

AROUND THE ASC

Starting this August, Michael C. Musheno will join the National Science Foundation as a visiting scientist and Director of the Law and Social Science Program. He will be succeeding Felice Levine, who is joining the American Sociological Association as Executive Officer. Musheno is currently a Professor in the School of Criminal Justice Studies at Arizona State University and Director of a newly established AIDS Studies Program. From 1980 to 1983 he served as Director and Chair of the Faculty of the School of Justice Studies. His research interests have ranged from studies of impact and implementation to police discretion, community corrections, and now disputing and conflict management of AIDS disputes. A long-standing member of the American Society of Criminology, Musheno will be at the annual meeting in November and looks forward to talking with ASC colleagues about their research interests.

On May 16, 1991 at 2:30 p.m., eleven Oklahoma Department of Corrections inmates attended a graduation ceremony at the Lexington Assessment and Reception Center. Of the eleven, one outstanding accomplishment is that of Sidney A. Worthen who has completed his Masters Degree from Central State University. Ironically, his degree is in Criminal Justice Management and Administration. Mr. Worthen states: “I would like to continue my education to the Ph.D., or Juris Doctor level. With membership in the American Correctional Association, American Society of Criminology, and the American Sociological Association, staying up-to-date with the profession requires time and dedication, which I have! I'd like to help others to better themselves.”

produced the criminal justice system, based on punishment, with prisons as its symbol. The scientific position has resulted in attempts to reform criminals (biology and psychology) or to reform society (sociology). Thus, law and science have worked at cross-purposes, from different values and for different purposes.

A tension arises out of the crossed purposes of science and law: criminology is committed to science, criminal justice to law. This means that criminology is fundamentally concerned with truth, criminal justice with justice. Neither is opposed to the most fundamental value of the other; rather, the contrasting commitments of each play out differently. For instance, the science of criminology is concerned with finding the facts that make for truth about why people commit crime; that is, people in general or in broad categories. The law of criminal justice is concerned with finding the facts of an altogether different order: sufficient to establish that a given, specific person has committed a crime. Criminology's concern extends beyond its findings: what to do accordingly, so that fewer people in the future will commit crime, including those specific ones who have already done so. Criminal justice, by contrast is concerned to do what is right, not about general populations in the future (except insofar as that may be a consequence of what is done about specific individuals); criminal justice is instead concerned with what to do about individuals who have committed crimes already — in the past, so to speak. Thus, criminology looks forward; criminal justice, in a sense, looks backward.

Criminology stems from the positive tradition that began in the 19th century. Criminal justice began in the classical tradition in the 18th century. What emerged from the positive tradition of criminology is the medical model, or more broadly the environmental model of doing something to change the determinative, criminogenic circumstances in which crime occurs — be that biological, psychological, social, economic, geographic, or otherwise. Therapy, broadly or narrowly conceived, is what dominates criminology's concern.

What emerged from the classical tradition is the justice model. Punishment, broadly conceived as control by special deterrence or incapacitation, or narrowly conceived as retribution, is what dominates criminal justice. The various "ologies" of causation are peripheral to criminal justice. Science, out of its commitment to the "is-ness" of truth, is ready, willing, and (some would say often, others would say sometimes) able to do therapeutically what is possible. Law, out of its commitment to the "ought-ness" of justice, is often resistant to what science can do, out of its insistence that some things ought not to be done even if possible — because such things (or the ways by which such things are done) collide with values such as autonomy, dignity, and privacy, which law (informed by these corollaries or implications of justice) would protect.

Someone of the scientific persuasion might say something like the following: As a result of these two traditions, we are faced today with a major crisis in our crime control policies. The legalistic approach has led to an overcrowded and ineffective criminal justice system where the accused are disposed of in less than ten minutes and those who find their way into prison serve approximately 20 percent of their sentence. There is no effort made to either help the defendant or to protect the public. The only concern is meeting the bureaucratic goals of the criminal justice system. The threat of crime is everywhere. Violations of civil rights occur in a setting where violence is a normal part of life, as for example, in Los Angeles with the beating of Rodney King. The most recent crime control policy out of the White House and the Bush administration is to allow the use of tainted evidence in criminal trials if gotten in good faith, to increase the use of mandatory sentences, and to rely on the death penalty to stop crime. The Supreme Court recently held that under some circumstances, coerced confessions can be used to gain a conviction. Such actions reduce our confidence in the criminal justice system and the government's ability to control crime to zero. On the other hand, the efforts of psychology and sociology are for naught, since we do not have a unified theory of behavior, or a method for diagnosing and treating criminals. Criminologists are still trying to integrate differential association, strain theory, and social control theory from the 1920-1960 era without any attention being paid to biology and psychology. None of these theories have been applied successfully to the reduction of criminal behavior.

Someone of the legal persuasion might say something like the following: It is true that the system is a mess. However, the way out of it is a carefully reformed system that represents fully the need for various safeguards of due process. All of the promise of science is beside the point until the system can be put in order. Someone of the scientific persuasion would state that a scientific approach, in place of a legal approach to behavior, would make justice through punishment and prisons, or due process concerns concerning civil rights, not relevant and past history.

These values are so strong and the conflicts so sharp that one cannot expect much, and certainly not easy, resolution of the tension. However, progress can be made in at least one way. By developing institutions for teaching and research with a wide representation of both criminology and criminal justice in the variety of disciplines that comprise each: sociologists, psychologists, biologists, and others who represent the sciences of human behavior explanation; philosophers, lawyers, public administrators, and others who represent the reasoned response, the "processed" response, the "systemed" response, to crimes and those who commit crimes; and others, like historians, whose concerns span all of it. Faculties as multidisciplinary as this, with members engaged collaboratively, would have through their work an integrative effect that would tend to bridge the gaps and narrow the differences. Even if only partial relief of the tensions would result, the understanding and mutual respect would be valuable enough.

There are several ways beyond that in which law and science can be drawn together, if not integrated. One involves a philosophical integration around the differences between legal assumptions and scientific assumptions. This is obviously difficult to do, but efforts are made from time to time. One, recently, is Judge Richard Posner's PROBLEMS OF JURISPRUDENCE (Harvard University Press, 1990) which discusses how the two philosophical traditions of idealism and empiricism has impacted on legal thinking. The idealistic approach is based on rationality and reasoning by deduction. Legal reasoning is based upon precedent, hierarchy, tradition, and authority. There is no way in this system for correcting errors since the correctness of decisions hinges on past decisions. Posner is very critical of legal traditionalism, whereby judges find law in nature, rather than in empirical experience. Traditional legal reasoning leaves the law as a self-contained body of knowledge without interaction with the behavioral sciences. Posner argues for interdisciplinary legal studies whereby law is integrated with psychology, sociology, and especially economics. Posner selects economics as his example of an exemplar of science. Another could have been modern neurology and psychobiology. To quote Posner: "Advances in medicine, genetics, space exploration, weapons, technology, computers, cosmology, and other areas of science and technology make traditional legal doctrine analysis ... seem to many younger scholars, and to some older ones as well, old-fashioned, passe, tired."

Posner would make a law pragmatic enterprise based on positivism, science, and legal realism as found in Holmes, Cardozo, and Pound, expressed in Holmes' maxim, "the life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience." Law would be a means for social control and the resolution of conflict, and the standard would be the consequences of legal policies on public issues. Social ends would replace moralistic standards. This approach insists that the legal goal of justice or retribution, looking backward to a punishment worthy of the deed, has no utilitarian value. Punishment does not protect society or create social order, and the only conceivable reason for having law is to create social order and protect life, liberty, and property. If law does not do these things, and the present murder and burglary rates suggest that it does not, then a new ethical underpinning for law must be found. The legal process must be scientifically based so that it improves the quality of life and the protection of society. This means it must be forward looking, and the consequences of legal action must be known before policy decisions are made. Scientific work is evaluated by its ability to predict and control the future, and legal decisions must face the same type of accountability.

Having expressed that approach, it must be noted that philosophers will, many of them, insist that retribution — doing to offenders what they deserve — is the whole point of criminal justice. The thrust of criminology will meet stubborn resistance on the part of those who believe that criminal justice is not a scientific enterprise at all.

Another issue involved in the science-versus-law debate is that of mind/body dualism. Rationalism assumes a mind separate from a body, whereas modern science assumes a monistic system of brain and body. The brain, not the mind, controls behavior. Modern philosophy is attempting to deal with mind/body dualism, for instance, in NEUROPHILOSOPHY: TOWARD A UNIFIED SCIENCE OF MIND/ BRAIN (MIT Press, 1986) by Patricia Churchland. If there is no mind, then such concepts as mens rea, free will, moral responsibility, and guilt are no longer meaningful. In their place we have diagnosis, prediction, treatment, early intervention, prevention, and what is generally known as the medical model. Courts are now involved in attempting to establish the sanity or insanity of the defendant, rather than doing a CAT scan or nutritional analysis of the brain of the defendant. Insanity becomes an issue of right and wrong and rationality, and as such it has no scientific validity whatsoever. On the other hand, mind has encountered such challenges from the beginning and seems remarkably able to survive — and will for as long as the challengers think they have minds to change.

The brain has evolved from the reptilian brain which controls basic instinctual behaviors as involved in food, sex and survival; to the human primate brain which combines the reptilian brain with the cortex and rational brain. From the reptilian brain mankind inherited the need for revenge, anger, and punishments, whereas from the rational brain mankind created law and justice in order to rationalize prisons and electric chairs. The law is based on raw emotionality covered with a layer of rationality called just retribution.

Another approach to an integrated law/science discipline is from the point-of-view of crime prevention. Crime prevention is proactive, takes action before the crime is committed, and thereby prevents crime, rather than being reactive and waiting for the crime to occur, as the criminal justice system does. Crime prevention can prevent criminal behavior and in this way reduce the need for the police-courts-prison system. Millions of dollars go into this system yearly while at the same time the crime rate continues to increase.

Crime prevention demands that we first must understand human behavior. Criminology must develop an integrated interdisciplinary approach to crime and criminal behavior. Such an integration would include biology and psychology, both of which are very much ignored in criminology even today. Major advances have been made in these areas, especially in biological psychiatry and psychology. The role of the brain in behavior is now understood as it was not even 20 years ago. Areas of the brain controlling violence and aggression have been pinpointed, and medications have been developed to control brain activity involved in violence.

New knowledge of human behavior can be used to prevent crime. Crime prevention can be either at the individual level or environmental level. Several examples of crime prevention at the individual level can be cited. People who are violent are often low in the neurotransmitter serotonin. Serotonin is a product of amino acids which can be gotten from diet or from health food stores. Violent offenders have been shown to have abnormal levels of nutrient minerals and high levels of toxic materials such as lead, cadmium, mercury, and aluminum. A California study involving prison inmates found excessive levels of manganese in hair samples taken from the inmates. Cocaine releases and then depletes the dopamine and serotonin supplies in the brain. Cocaine addiction can be treated with nutrition and antidepressants.

At a recent NIDA conference on drug abuse, the use of medications to control drug abuse were discussed, including the use of naltrexone and buprenorphine for opiate addiction and desipramine and amantadine for cocaine addiction.

Drug addiction can be prevented and treated by nutrition and medication, and yet 50 percent or better of our hospital beds are occupied by drug offenders, and up to 80 percent of those arrested have used drugs during the past month. Violence can be prevented by EEG scans, CAT scans, PET scans, and MRI scans. We should focus our attention on the 5 percent who become career criminals with a history of violence and drug/alcohol abuse. We should also focus on early childhood and developmental factors. Age birth to six is the time to prevent crime, not age 15 to 18. If we are going to establish prevention programs for youths, we must also resolve two additional legal problems. The law does not allow compulsory treatment, though it allows compulsory punishment. We must resolve the problem of early intervention for medical reasons. This is no new problem for law, since modern genetics and biotechnology have introduced many "right to live" and "right to die" issues for the law.

Legal/medical ethics is a critical area for examination at this point in the history of law and science.

Another problem which must be resolved is that of the ability of the scientist to predict future dangerous behavior. Scientific knowledge and technology must reach that state of development that it can with great accuracy state that this person is dangerous or is not dangerous.

Crime prevention can also involve environmental design. This means finding those physical features in the environment that are related to high crime rate areas: bridges, highways, apartment buildings, business complexes and malls, shrubbery, lighting and other critical design features. The early social ecologists of the University of Chicago studied the spatial distribution of crime, but they concluded that the social environment was critical, not the physical. Burgess, Shaw, McKay, and others emphasized norms, social learning, and social disorganization, rather than physical design. This approach to crime prevention must also be interdisciplinary, involving urban geography and urban planning, environmental psychology, criminology, and sociology.

Our studies at Florida State University have revealed basic environmental patterns for convenience store robberies, distribution of cocaine in a public housing area, crime in a neighborhood next to a housing project with a major cocaine problem, and crime on a university campus.

Crime can be prevented by the design of buildings, the use of streets and parks, and by landscaping and other land use factors. Crime prevention would do away with the high cost of crime, overcrowded prisons, overcrowded criminal courts, police brutality, civil rights violations, a victimized public, and a criminal population which suffers at the hands of a revengeful public. Infants need not grow up to be murderers or rapists or drug addicts. Through crime prevention they would lead decent lives, and this would also be of help to those about them who otherwise would become crime victims.

These examples of brutality and civil rights violations also pinpoint the frustration of law enforcement personnel in the resolution of the science/legalism debate. One reason for this frustration could be because police officers are trained from a legalistic, free-will perspective. They are taught to react to offenders as people who have chosen to violate the statutes of their particular community, and, as such, must pay for their violation. Very few officers and administrators have adopted any sentiment for the deterministic approach to behavior. By its nature, the police profession is grounded in the legalistic, free-will approach. Most officers are not trained in the social sciences and it is only a recent development that departments have begun to compensate officers with a college education.

With little to no appreciation of the potential reasons for human behavior and the appropriate responses to it, police officers are realizing little is being done to reduce the crime problem. With this knowledge and the fact that police work is becoming even more dangerous, police officers may be resorting to increased brutality and there may be more incentives to use coerced confessions and tainted evidence. The unethical nature of current police behavior may be the direct result of police officer training.

This state of affairs calls for a possible redirection in the training of police officers and the administration of policing. Officers need more behavioral science education to provide them with the deterministic appreciation required to deal with offenders. Universities could sponsor short workshops and seminars on criminal behavior, drug/alcohol abuse, and prevention strategies as discussed above. Police departments could be trained in CPTED measures and encouraged to use resources for preventing crime rather than chasing it around. Police departments are the only agencies within the criminal justice system that are in any way involved in crime prevention. Lawyers — judges, legislators, prosecutors, law professors — are certainly not involved in crime prevention, since the purpose of justice is revenge and retribution. Nor are prison officials involved in crime prevention. Police officers need to be and should be because their lives depend on it.

Police administration will also have to provide a broader background from which to develop alternatives to meet the needs of the offender and the situation. Officers and police administration alike could be redirected toward this type of diagnostic situation. Officers should evaluate the offender from a broader base and divert the offender as deemed necessary. This would mean that the community would have to be scanned for the appropriate response centers. These centers could include drug treatment centers, mental health clinics, groups to help with specific problems such as alcoholism, neonatal care, etc. Officers would be in a better position to make a decision on the appropriate course of action for each offender. Continuing to send offenders through the criminal justice system or not processing them at all would be futile. It would do little to impede the frustration confronting police at the present time, and clearly it would do very little to change the behavior of the offender.

Using this scientific approach in police response would provide a transition mechanism for crime prevention strategies. Because crime prevention ideas are proactive in nature, many people are going to be missed as interventions are implemented or their behavior may be so advanced that early detection interventions would not have an effect. Police officers who operate from a scientific perspective would be able to react to such persons, and having officers trained in the scientific approach would be a step in bridging the gap between science and legalism. We also might begin to eliminate some of the unethical behavior by police which we are currently witnessing.

All of the accomplishments of the scientists can only be applauded by those on the law side. For the lawyer, total integration is unlikely as long as there is nagging concern about such things as early intervention because of a symptom or a diagnosis, rather than an offense against the criminal laws. This is a major source of strain within the system since the legal position waits for the crime to occur, whereas the scientific position prevents the crime before it occurs.

Finally, if we are to integrate law and science we must provide for an interdisciplinary faculty and graduate training for students in graduate programs in criminology and criminal justice must have some training in jurisprudence; but law students, public administration students, and others should be exposed to basic behavioral science as it affects criminal law. This could be accomplished in third year seminars devoted to law and behavioral science topics, or in graduate programs leading to joint degrees. Special training programs could be established for judges, prosecutors, defense attorneys, and other practitioners on such issues.

Law and science must work together if we are to create a successful crime control model. The future of criminology and criminal justice requires major changes both in the educational system and in the criminal justice system if this is to be accomplished.

As long as the law rejects science and remains committed to concepts of punishment, revenge and the mind rather than concepts of prevention, treatment, and brain defects, the crime problem will remain exactly where it is today.

PUBLIC POLICY COMMITTEE:
Procedures and Guidelines

The ASC Board has determined that public stances on relevant social issues should be limited principally to those issues for which there is substantial empirical evidence. Such evidence should be accumulated in connection with resolutions to the annual business meeting, the Board, or the National Policy Committee. In general, the steps for moving an issue toward a final policy statement are as follows:

a. Issues are referred to the Public Policy Committee by the Executive Board, Divisions, ASC members, or the PPC itself.
b. PPC determines whether or not an issue warrants further investigation. If not, it rejects it for stated reasons.
c. An accepted issue is subject to "investigation" which may include submitted statements, position papers, and accumulation of relevant empirical data.
d. PPC recommends actions to the Board (including specified dissemination targets). Non-approval stops the action. Approval leads to publication of relevant materials and/or resolutions in the newsletter and, where timely, in the convention program as agenda material.
e. The Business Meeting attendees vote on the issue, this vote being advisory and transmitted to the Board (or Executive Committee) for final decision. Implementation is in the hands of the President.

To discuss relevant issues or for further information on procedures, contact Felice Levine, Chair, ASC Public Policy Committee, American Sociological Association, 1722 N Street, N.W., Washington, DC 20036, (202) 833-3410, ASA@GWUVM.BITNET.

The Criminal Justice Institute Presents its Eleventh Year of Valuable Information about Corrections, Probation, and Parole in Four 1991 Volumes

The Corrections Yearbook annual survey of federal, state, and local criminal justice agencies is conducted by researchers George M. and Camille G. Camp. It is produced by compiling information solicited by questionnaire from state and federal adult and juvenile correctional agencies, state and federal probation and parole agencies, and jail systems with an average daily population of more than 200. Follow-up telephone calls are made to verify responses and gather further information. The responses of these agencies are entered into CJI's database, tabulated, and, where appropriate, averaged, compared with other subject categories, or compared with prior years' findings. The results are presented in the Corrections Yearbook in graphic, tabular, and narrative formats.

Partners and principals of CJI, both George and Camille Camp are schooled in corrections research and experienced in correctional administration. They share their expertise in correctional planning, prison management, staffing, policy and procedure development, staff training, securing operations, and offender programs through consultation, research, and publications.

NEWLY FORMED: Criminal Justice Library Network

An historic meeting occurred at the School of Criminal Justice, Rutgers University, when the World Criminal Justice Library Network was established. Distinguished Professor Gerhard Mueller delivered the opening address in which he convincingly demonstrated the globalization of all aspects of criminal justice: from street crime to transnational crime. Dr. Mueller, formerly the Chief of the United Nations Criminal Justice and Crime Prevention Branch in Vienna, pointed to the information explosion in this once narrow field, and emphasized the pressing need for libraries to share resources and services.

At the meeting, a steering committee, co-chaired by Phyllis Schultze, librarian of the Rutger/NCCD Collection, and Graeme Newman, Coordinator of UNCJIN, was appointed.

The Rutgers School of Criminal Justice agreed to serve as administrative headquarters for the network. A directory of participating libraries and agencies is being prepared and will be available from the WCLN at cost. Inquiries should be addressed to: Phyllis Schultze, Rutgers Criminal Justice/NCCD Collection, S.I. Newhouse Center for Law and Justice, 15 Washington Street, Newark, N.J. 07102 (FAX: 201-648-1275).

On-line access to data bases and news concerning WCLN is available through UNCIJIN. UNCIJIN is a world wide electronic information network and bulletin board. Membership in UNCIJIN is open to all interested individuals and organizations. Inquiries should be addressed to: Graeme Newman, UNCIJIN Coordinator, School of Criminal Justice, State University of New York, 135 Western Avenue, Albany, NY 12222, (Fax: 518-442-5603).

The steering committee is already planning the next meeting, scheduled to be held in 1993, probably in Italy.
FUNDING AVAILABLE
LAW AND SOCIAL SCIENCE PROGRAM
NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

The Program for Law and Social Science at the National Science Foundation supports social scientific studies of law and law-like systems of rules. These can include, but are not limited to, research designed to enhance the scientific understanding of the impact of law; human behavior and interaction as these relate to law; the dynamics of legal decisionmaking; and the nature, sources, and consequences of variations and changes in legal institutions. The primary consideration is that the research shows promise of advancing a scientific understanding of law and legal process. Within this framework, the Program has an "open window" for diverse theoretical perspectives, methods, and contexts for study. For example, research on social control, crime causation, violence, victimization, legal and social change, patterns of discretion, procedural justice, compliance and deterrence, and regulatory enforcement are among the many areas that have recently received program support.

The review process for the Law and Social Science Program takes six to nine months. It includes appraisal of proposals by ad hoc reviewers selected for their expertise from throughout the social scientific community and by an advisory panel that meets twice a year. The target dates for the submission of proposals are August 15 for proposals to be funded as early as January 1992 and January 15 for proposals to be funded on or after July 1992. For further information on application procedures, write or call Michael C. Musheno, Program Director, Law and Social Science, National Science Foundation, Washington, DC 20550. Phone: (202) 357-9567, FAX: (202) 357-0957.

NIJ ANNOUNCES VISITING FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

The National Institute of Justice (NIJ) is accepting applications from criminal justice researchers and practitioners for 1991-92 NIJ Visiting Fellowships. This competitive program offers individuals the opportunity to participate in the work of the institute while undertaking independent research on policy-relevant issues in the criminal justice area.

Current priorities are gangs; victims; drug testing; community-oriented policing; prevention and education; and emerging crime issues. NIJ is particularly interested in receiving applications pertaining to criminal justice evaluations.

NIJ encourages applications from (1) researchers with broad, extensive criminal justice research experience; (2) postdoctorate researchers; and (3) criminal justice professionals with at least a bachelor's degree and strong operating-agency experience in such areas as police, courts, corrections, probation, and victim services.

For 6 to 18 months, NIJ Visiting Fellows work with Institute staff, other Fellows, and national criminal justice leaders at NIJ's offices in Washington, D.C. Along with full financial benefits including salary, fringe benefits, and relocation expenses, NIJ also provides a personal computer, and easy access to library resources and computerized databases and datasets.
