HIGHLIGHTS OF THE
1996 ASC ANNUAL MEETING - CHICAGO

Ray Paternoster
University of Maryland and
Members of the 1996 Program Committee

The annual meeting of the American Society of Criminology for 1996 will be held at the Downtown Marriott Hotel in Chicago from November 20-23. The 1996 meeting promises to be one of the largest meetings ever. The advantage of this is that the program offers a very rich assortment of criminological topics that will appeal to all tastes. The disadvantage is that the Marriott will fill up early, so make your reservations soon! The hotel is wonderful for our needs, the hotel itself has many amenities, it is conveniently located in downtown Chicago, hotel rooms are modern, and meeting rooms are both spacious and plentiful. In the following pages, the members of the 1996 ASC Program Committee are proud to present you with the preliminary program that contains the list of topics for panels, roundtables, workshops, thematic and author-meets-critics sessions, and plenaries.

The Program Committee has assembled approximately 450 sessions for this year’s meeting. Each panel is scheduled for one and one-half hours. There are four blocks of panel meeting times: 9:15-10:45, 11:00-12:30, 1:30-3:00, and 3:15 to 4:45. Panel sessions are scheduled from 9:15 on Wednesday morning until 4:45 on Saturday afternoon. During each block of panel meeting periods there will be between 26 and 29 individual sessions. The Marriott’s meeting rooms are very convenient, located on the 5th, 6th, and 10th floors. With nearly 450 sessions, the Program Committee feels that there will be a lot of something for everyone at this year’s meeting.

TOWN MEETING:
THE FUTURE OF ASC

John H. Laub
Vice President of ASC

The American Society of Criminology is a healthy, vibrant organization, but what does the future hold for this association? Reading the statements from the various candidates running for the elected offices of the ASC, it is evident that there are a number of possible “futures” for this organization. While no one denies the past accomplishments, there is increasing recognition of the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead. Indeed, the question of the future of the American Society of Criminology is especially opportune given the recent growth of the organization, the myriad of changes in the various disciplines and professions it serves, and the elevated attention to issues of crime and justice among politicians, policy-makers, and the media both in United States and around the world.

From time to time, it is critical for professional organizations to take stock of where they have been and where they are going. Recognizing the need for a “strategic plan” for ASC as an organization, this past year Charles Wellford, President of ASC, formed an ad hoc committee to consider the future of ASC. John Laub, ASC Vice President, was asked to chair the committee. Other members of the committee are: Robert Bursik, Marcia Chaiken, Chris Eskridge, Timothy Flanagan, Vernetta Young, and Marjorie Zatz. The committee thought it would be useful (and fun) to hold a “town meeting” at the annual conference to hear from ASC members about their views of the future of the organization. The idea is to have an open discussion and lively exchange of ideas with as many ASC members

In addition to panel sessions, there are six plenaries planned for this year’s meetings. The plenaries begin on Wednesday evening at 5:00. This first plenary is sponsored by the Women’s Division of the ASC, who will be celebrating their tenth anniversary. They plan an exciting plenary session that will be a tribute to the many and important contributions by women to criminology. Other plenaries are planned for Thursday morning and evening, Friday morning and evening, and Saturday morning. Each plenary is scheduled for one hour, the morning plenaries begin at 8:00, and the evening plenaries at 5:00. The Thursday morning plenary is devoted to a discussion of the development of criminological theory, invited panelists include Robert Clutterfield, Julie Horney, Adrian Raine, and Charles R. Tittle. Given the likely divergent views of criminological theory each participant has, this session promises lively discussion. The Thursday evening plenary is devoted to a “blast from the past.” Robert Sampson has assembled a panel whose members will take us from the contributions of the old “Chicago School” of criminology to its current manifestations. In the Friday morning plenary, Al Blumstein and a small sample of research fellows from the National Consortium for Violence Research will discuss research in violent crime. In the Friday evening plenary, John Dilulio and Al Blumstein will engage in what promises to be an informative and spirited exchange on the influence of criminologists on public policy. Joan Petersilia will moderate this exchange. Finally, to start the full day of panel sessions, the Program Committee has added a Saturday morning plenary. This plenary concerns drug policy, and will feature speakers addressing the topic of the promise of harm reduction. Lana Harrison has assembled a very interesting group of drug scholars to discuss this topic.

It should be noted that each member of the Program Committee was asked to assemble a special panel that would be dear to their hearts. These special panels will be highlighted in the final program books we will all receive at the meetings. There are also ten author-meets-critics sessions planned to enable us to try and catch up with an ever increasing literature.

Of course, our days and nights will not entirely be spent with panels, roundtables, and plenaries. There is much to do in the beautiful and exciting city of Chicago. Several officially sponsored tours will be available, and an unofficial guide to restaurants, clubs, shopping and general places for good times in Chicago will be provided at the meetings.

We, the members of the 196 Program Committee, look forward to seeing old and new ASC members at the Chicago meetings. It promises to be a very exciting four days.

as possible. Meca Chesney-Lind has graciously agreed to serve as the moderator for the meeting, which will take place on Friday, November 22, from 12:30 to 1:30.

There are several serious issues that face this organization and these controversial matters need to be addressed head on if ASC is to remain a healthy, vibrant organization in the future. Some of the questions we plan to discuss at the town meeting are:

What future organizational changes should we consider? For instance, some members think we should abolish all divisions, while others contend that more divisions are needed. What are the advantages and disadvantages of divisions within ASC?

What should our growth goals be and how can we achieve them? What more can we do to make the ASC appealing to students? What efforts are needed to enhance diversity among the membership and leadership of ASC?

What new services should we consider for our members? Should we modify or eliminate any current services? Some members think we should raise our dues and provide more services, while others want to keep our dues low and offer the current level of services. How do we generate revenue for any new services? Are we happy with the length, timing, or structure of our annual meeting?

What should be the role of the ASC in public policy debates? Some members argue that as a professional society we should take stances on such issues as the death penalty and racial bias in sentencing, while others believe that ASC as a whole should not offer an opinion on any topic.

These topics as well as others brought to the meeting by the membership will be discussed. Hope to see you there! Remember the ASC is your organization and your ideas and concerns as to the future of ASC are important.
IN THE CLASSROOM

GETTING READY FOR FALL CLASSES?

While it is unrealistic to overhaul a course every semester, professors often find it worthwhile to make minor adjustments to improve a course from semester to semester. Here is a short checklist of items to review when focusing on updating your courses:

1) Do I need to update my syllabus? Are the readings current? Do I need to clarify class policies related to grading, attendance or makeup exams?

2) What were my most successful activities/lectures/seminars last semester? Why were they so successful? Do I want to expand this strategy to other topics?

3) What were my least successful activities/lectures/seminars last semester? What adjustments should I make before trying again?

4) What was the most difficult part of the test? How can I improve my students test-taking abilities? Did they learn by preparing for the tests or did they simply prepare to survive them?

5) What can I do next semester to continue to incorporate issues of diversity into my curriculum?

NEWS FROM THE DIVISIONS

DIVISION ON CRITICAL CRIMINOLOGY

At the 1995 ASC meeting in Boston, the Division on Critical Criminology honored two criminologists; one with its Lifetime Achievement Award, and the other with its award for the Critical Criminologist of the Year. Bill Chambliss, Professor of Sociology at George Washington University received the Lifetime Achievement Award in recognition of his role over the last 30 years as one of the most influential and productive students of the relationship between law and systems of power. Walter DeKeseredy, Associate Professor of Sociology at Carleton University, was selected as the Division's Critical Criminologist of the Year for his exceptional scholarly productivity, and particularly his extensive writing in the area of domestic violence.

At its 1995 business meeting, the Division agreed to institute a student paper competition to select the best contribution in the area of critical criminology by a student - either graduate or undergraduate. If you know of a student with a high quality paper that should be considered for this recognition (or if you are a student with such a paper), please send it to Dr. Jim Thomas, Professor, Department of Sociology, Northern Illinois University, De Kalb, IL 60115.

Also on the student front, the Division authorized funding of one room/suite in upcoming meeting hotels that could be used by graduate students as a hospitality room during the day, and as a sleeping place for several students at night.

The Division's social event followed in the tradition of past gatherings with its unique combination of sociability and homemade music provided this year by a shifting ensemble of critical pickers, harpoon players, and spoon slappers. We are hoping for more of the same in 1996!

DIVISION ON WOMEN AND CRIME

Compiling Our Archives

At our last business meeting, the Division on Women and Crime authorized me to contact the Schlesinger Library on the History of Women in America to see if they would be interested in the Division's archives.

I have heard from one of the curators, who writes:

Because there are now so many more active women contributing to many fields than in the past, and because the Schlesinger Library is offered so many collections, we must consider each offer carefully, and in most cases must see either the collection or a sample of its contents before making a decision.

The curator also asks nine specific questions about the volume of the records, annual rate of growth, condition, etc. Thus the best way to proceed would seem to be to have people send me documents pertaining to the Division's founding and evolution. All sorts of records are valuable: correspondence, minutes, photographs, scrapbooks, speeches, financial records, tapes, etc. In fact, the more varied and detailed the records, the better. Label them ARCHIVES PROJECT and mail them to:

Prof. Nicole Rafter
College of Criminal Justice

Northeastern University
Boston, MA 02115

Please phone if you have questions: 617-373-3362.

I hope we will be able to compile a collection that will appeal to the Schlesinger, enable us to document our collective history, and provide material for future historians interested in the ways women have entered and reshaped the field of criminology.

I will be looking forward to hearing from you.

CALL FOR PAPERS

Behavioral Sciences and the Law will devote a special issue to International Perspectives on the Relationship between Law and the Behavioral Sciences. Potential contributions can focus on any relevant topic; however, it is hoped that submissions will examine the nature of interdisciplinary, international developments and consider possible implications and the future of such developments. Comparative analyses are preferred, but not required.

The deadline for receipt of manuscripts is January 3, 1997. Manuscripts should be twenty to thirty double-spaced pages. Failure to conform to the style requirements of the newest Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association or the 15th edition of a Uniform System of Citation may lead to rejection of the manuscript. Submissions must contain a 150 word abstract.

Send three copies (2 of which need to be prepared so that they can be "blind-reviewed") to either of the special issue editors, Alan Tomkins or David Carson. TABLE OF CONTENTS

Stress, Culture, and Aggression is an examination of the association between stress and aggression in the United States. This book is a continuation of two of the authors' previous research on stress. Linsky and Straus wrote Social Stress in the United States: Links to Regional Patterns in Crime and Illness, in 1986. In Stress, Culture, and Aggression, the authors attempt to update the findings from the first book, update their State Stress Index, and include new data on violence directed both internally and externally.

The authors of this book set out to answer a number of related questions. The main questions according to the authors are: 1) has life been getting more stressful since 1976; 2) are levels of stress associated with geographic region in the United States; 3) what are the consequences of living in a stressful society; and 4) does character or cultures in a society determine the effects of stress. However, the main focus of this book is whether or not stress results in aggression. This focus includes both aggression towards others and to oneself (self-destructive behavior such as suicide, smoking, and the abuse of alcohol).

The authors argue that the relationship between stress and aggression has been studied at the individual level, but not at the societal level. "This neglect of social stress as an explanation for society-to-society differences in aggression may be due, in part, to the lack of an objective means of comparing the stressfulness of life in different societies, regions, or communities" (p. 7). In order to examine stress, the authors developed a multi-indicator measure, the State Stress Index (SSI), that would attempt to measure the extent stressful events occur in each of the fifty states. The SSI is used to evaluate statistics on business failure, unemployment, divorce, abortion, illegitimate birth, disaster assistance, welfare, and school dropout rates for the fifty states.

Part I of this book is a discussion of the methodology, a discussion of stress, and an evaluation of the change in stress from 1976 to 1982. The research in this book is part of an ongoing research project. As a result, the findings reported are based on both the 1976 SSI results and the 1982 SSI results. In addition, the authors use several other indexes, such as: the Legitimate Violence Index, the Status of Women Index, a Perceived Stress Index, and a Proscriptive Norm Index. Furthermore, the authors employ multiple indicators for aggressive behaviors in order to test various hypotheses. The purpose of this was to reduce bias.

Part II was an analysis of stress and self-destructive behavior. The authors examined the relationships between smoking and death (Chapter 3); drinking culture and drinking problems (Chapter 4); perceived stress and suicide (Chapter 5); and gender differences in the links between stress, suicide, and homicide (Chapter 6). The authors give a convincing argument that many people use stress as an excuse for self-destructive behavior. This is most evidently seen in the levels of death associated with smoking. The authors used deaths from lung cancer and purchases of cigarettes as two measures of deaths associated with smoking. However, the authors failed to account for, or even mention, deaths that may have resulted from lung cancer as a result of secondary smoke.

Part III addresses the connection between stress and aggression towards others. This section has four chapters that deal with the relationship between culture, stress and alcohol (Chapter 7); stress and homicide (Chapter 8); legitimate violence, gun availability and methods of homicide (Chapter 9); and stress and rape (Chapter 10) were each addressed in this section.

Part IV (Chapter 11) is a summary and conclusion section. In this section, the authors also created a section for the policy implications of their study. There are two possible policy responses that deserve mention. First, the authors suggest that some of the problems of stress should be controlled closer to the source. "For instance, policies could be directed at reducing stressful events as work stoppages, mortgage foreclosures, and dropping out of school." (p. 171). Secondly, the authors suggest implementing programs that would educate individuals on how to rechannel stress away from themselves and others.

Overall, I would recommend this book for those interested in studying the areas of stress, culture, and aggression. It is difficult to recommend this book for use in a specific class, because it does not fit neatly into any one category. However, it is an important work, in that it gives a unique explanation for aggressive behavior directed both internally and externally. In addition, the authors appear to have spent considerable time laying out each chapter. In each chapter, the authors give a discussion of the theoretical basis for each link with stress, and a discussion of the methodology used to test that theory. Furthermore, at the end of each chapter, the authors give a brief summary. However, this book is also important for methodological reasons. The authors provide an excellent example of how to use several different measures in order to validate findings.
The first section of this book, which examines the role of women as criminal justice professionals, contains articles focusing on the issues women face specifically as police officers, lawyers, and correctional personnel. Hale and Bennett discuss the role of organizational structure in inhibiting women not only joining police ranks, but also in their connection with fellow officers. They further describe the legal mechanisms through which females have begun to break through these barriers. Gratch focuses on the problem of sexual harassment faced by female police officers. This chapter defines sexual harassment and outlines the general consequences of harassment in the workplace. Unfortunately, while she applies this framework to the police profession, the discussion of the unique problems faced by female officers who serve both as agents of social control (and who are thus entrusted with enforcement of harassment laws) and sometimes become victims of harassment is somewhat underdeveloped.

Pollock and Ramirez assess the progress women have made in the legal profession. They describe the role of feminist jurisprudence as an emerging school of legal thought. The primary focus of this chapter, however, is to track women through law schools and examine women's educational experience. Pollock and Ramirez report that women tend to feel stereotyped and generally are more likely than their male counterparts to relate that they have had negative experiences in law school. The authors go on to note that while the number of women in law schools is increasing, women continue to be underrepresented in both the administrations and faculties of law schools and as partners in major law firms. In turn, they describe how these discrepancies affect women who are just now entering or who are currently enrolled in law schools (and, indeed, those just entering into their chosen profession) by limiting possible contacts with prospective mentors who have experienced the unique perspective of functioning as women in the legal profession.

The final chapter in this section explores the role of women as correctional officers. Pollock summarizes the historical background of women's entry into this field, concentrating on the acceptance of women as officers in men's prisons. She describes not only the legal history leading up to women's employment in this field, but also the resistance that women have had, and to a large extent continue, to confront as their numbers increase in male facilities. Pollock specifically notes the unique problems faced by female corrections officers in male institutions where supervision and control are the modal philosophies, compared to their role in female and juvenile institutions, which tend toward treatment models. The third section focuses on the female offender in both historical and contemporary contexts. Female offenders are demographically profiled. Attention is drawn to the relationships between drugs and HIV/AIDS, along with the feminization of poverty, and female criminality. Specifically, authors in this section address how legal changes in drug policies during the 1980s culminated in the classification of more females as criminals, as opposed to patients, and replaced treatment programs with jails and prisons. Furthermore, the legal changes creating unique offenses for women to be classified as criminals, due to HIV/AIDS and the "war on drugs", also are profiled.

In Chapter 6, Merlo reviews the research on female offenders. She describes three perspectives - economic marginalization, increased formal social control, and drugs - which recently have gained attention as viable explanations of female criminality. While the discussions provided on these perspectives are thorough, a great deal of literature and numerous theoretical perspectives regarding the nature and changing trends of female criminality are absent (e.g.: Hagan's power-control theory, the liberation hypothesis and masculinity thesis, research on family effects, and the sexual nature of female crime). While the theories that Merlo excluded admittedly have received much criticism, they also have generated a great deal of discussion on both the sources of female crime and gender differences in criminality and thus do not warrant omission from a chapter on this topic. As such, while this chapter represents an adequate overview, it does not stand as a thorough discussion of the subject.

In the following chapter, Bagley and Merlo present an excellent review of the methods by which laws have been utilized and developed to control women, primarily through regulation of their bodies. They specifically focus on new laws and legislation developed to protect fetuses from women's drug use and women who are infected with HIV/AIDS. The authors categorize three different types of legislation that punish women in order to protect the fetus. They report with irony that while drug use by prospective fathers, as well as mothers, medically is linked to low birth weight and newborn addictions, no legal counterparts have been produced to remedy these problems. Bagley and Merlo also note that HIV/AIDS is increasing at a faster rate among women, and laws have been proposed to prosecute the knowing transmission of HIV/AIDS as a felony or misdemeanor. Notably, only one state (Texas) exempts HIV/AIDS positive mothers who may transmit the virus through breast-feeding and birth. Furthermore, they discuss how prostitutes are being targeted with these laws, while their male counterparts (clients) are not. This article concludes with several suggestions of how these problems faced by women with the law can be addressed.

In Chapter 8, Chesney-Lind and Pollock provide an outstanding overview of the historic and current treatment of women in United States prisons. They nest their discussion in the rubric of the debate over whether it is necessary for women's institutions to be equal to those of men, to avoid discriminatory treatment, or if women's prisons should be different, based on the unique needs of women. They succinctly summarize the data describing increases in female incarceration, provide a profile of female inmates, and discuss the administration of the male prison models in conjunction with the needs of female offenders. The material provided in this chapter is captivating and well-organized and is expected to serve as a model for future discussions of females in corrections.

The fourth section of the book focuses on the status of women as victims, paying attention to both legal remedies and treatment by the justice system. The first article in this segment surveys the issues surrounding victims of assaultive sex. To begin, Southard defines assaultive sex, rape in particular, and reviews the different categories of this crime. She continues by describing the extent of the rape crime problem and provides demographic descriptions of these victims. This section is followed by a discussion of research that attempts to uncover the motivation behind assaultive sex crimes. The conclusion stresses the need for greater societal awareness of the issues surrounding these crimes.

Hale and Mennti describe the evolution of battered woman's syndrome with specific reference to its use as a legal defense for women who kill their abusive partners. They outline the criteria which generally must be in place for expert testimony to be accepted by courts, and follow with a discussion of the unique need for experts to testify on behalf of battered women who kill. A case example of expert testimony in Pennsylvania is provided as one model of the use of expert testimony in trials of battered women who kill. Hale and Mennti note, however, that some states have not accepted battered woman's syndrome as an acceptable defense and these states generally have not admitted relevant testimony.

This focus on women as both victims, particularly battered women, and perpetrators of murder is continued by Berekos in Chapter 11. Berekos presents current demographical information regarding sex differences of both murderers and murder victims. For example, he notes that women are most likely to kill men when they do commit murder, and that innumerable murders by women are victim-precipitated. Furthermore, Berekos determines that female violence may be characterized as a "family phenomenon." He describes several theoretical models that are utilized to explain the unique impact of various familial variables in the creation of women's violence. Berekos closes the article by raising a few of the policy implications of this link between familial factors and female violence.

Merlo closes the book with a review of the research presented in the separate chapters. She reviews several emergent themes in the literature on women, crime, justice, and law. Specifically identified are consistencies in the research which demonstrate that women are not as involved in crime as men, are more likely to commit property as opposed to violent offenses, and that incarceration rates for women are increasing by a larger margin than are offending rates. In addition, Merlo provides an overview of the legislation that has led to the prosecution and punishment of women as methods to protect unborn children. She notes that such laws focus solely on female offenders without considering the adverse effects their male counterparts may have on child-conception and childrearing. This leads Merlo to explore the role of increasing formal control in the criminalization of women. She comments that it is not only legislative changes that lead to increasing arrests of women, but also the swelling bureaucratization of the system itself. She concludes by remarking that the issues confronting women are many and varied, and consequently lead to the division of women on many issues. Women have indeed made tremendous progress in this century, however, Merlo maintains that the future should now be addressed and the legal issues and social control of women must continue to be confronted.

This reader contains a solid set of articles that generally flow together to form a comprehensive overview of issues facing women in all areas of the criminal justice system, from offenders to practitioners to victims. Like the majority of texts and readers that focus solely on women in crime and criminal justice, this clearly should serve only as a supplement to other materials in a gender course on crime. A review of course syllabi on gender and crime/criminal justice suggests that there is no agreement on any one text as an ideal for this arena of research (to review consult Rasche and Goodstein, 1995). Rather, it appears that such courses primarily draw on each individual instructor's article compilations. While this may, to some degree, be due to the lack of any one predominant text on this subject, it also may reflect the fact that a myriad of approaches and styles are taken in the study of women and crime; while some draw heavily from feminist ideologies, some aim for a more mainstream approach, and yet others strive for some mixture of the two.

Some may criticize this particular reader for its lack of feminist theory. However, others will applaud it for its more mainstream approach. It should be noted that Women, Law, and Social Control would be an excellent supplement in any general criminology/criminal justice course. Indeed, because of the paucity of information regarding gender issues in most conventional criminology/criminal justice texts, the use of this reader would allow for the incorporation of gender issues and would be an asset for anyone teaching a conventional criminal justice/criminology course.

This edited collection of essays, part of the ACJS/Anderson Monograph Series, is billed as a collection of original works designed to redress the inadequacy of the existing social science literature on gangs in considering social control responses to gang related crimes. Current concern with the persistence of gangs in large urban areas, their proliferation and appearance in many smaller cities, the association of gangs with the drug trade and the lethal nature of much gang-related conflict certainly suggests the appropriateness of collecting a series of essays to show how the various entities within the criminal justice system use or could employ theoretically grounded and empirically supported measures to reduce the social and personal devastation wrought by gang-related crime. Unfortunately, this volume generally fails to fill this gap.

Of the ten essays in this collection, only two speak to specific crime control strategies. Jeffrey Rush's essay, "The Police Role in Dealing with Gangs," draws on current gang research to warn that inappropriate police responses, especially overreaction and overlabeling, enable community leaders and members to dodge their responsibility to contribute to the solution of the gang problem and may even foster escalation in gang activity and hostility. Rush advocates the development of specialized gang units or the designation of a special officer to ensure that the police department's response to gang activity is enhanced through the development and dissemination of good intelligence and to provide an informed police presence in community efforts to respond to gangs. Rush calls for police/community collaboration in suppressing gang activity without providing many specifics regarding how that might be done. A better effort is Gregory P. Orvis' essay, "Treating Youth Gangs Like Organized Crime Groups: An Innovative Strategy for Prosecuting Youth Gangs." It gives a clear overview of the population he recommends targeting, well organized youth gangs with territorial and/or utilitarian agendas. He offers a useful overview of possible strategies including adoption of an "enterprise theory of investigation," used successfully in the prosecution of many Mafia figures, priority prosecution, lobbying for legislation to target gangs and use of the forfeiture provisions of anti-racketeering statutes. In addition, he candidly assesses the problems associated with this approach.

The other essays are a rather eclectic assortment. "Gang Theories and Their Policy Implications," by J. Mitchell Miller and Albert Cohen, opens the collection by reviewing gang theory in terms of operating underclass and subcultural models and concludes by rejecting that dichotomy. Mark S. Hamm's essay, "Doing Gang Research in the 1990's: Pedagogical Implications of the Literature," says that the primary issues of gang research are how researchers can dispel gang members' paranoia about the intentions of the researcher and protect themselves from experiencing violence at the hands of their subjects. He summarily rejects as useless anything other than participant observation and direct interviews with gang members who are perpetrators of violence. Putting aside the essay's neglect of ethical issues associated with some of the research strategies described and the possibility that the study of gangs might encompass more than the study of violence, this essay seems out of place in a volume that does not include any examples of the kind of research Hamm endorses. Other offerings include a study which investigates family and peer correlates of gang membership and self-reported delinquency, an essay reviewing some school responses to the gang problem, another which defines terms pertaining to gang migration and proliferation, and a study which updates data on gangs and disruptive groups in prison. The contributions and shortcomings of these essays aside, none of them particularly advances the theme the collection allegedly addresses — the criminal justice system's response to crime. Essays considering such topics as the impact of various sentencing options on juvenile and young adult offenders or the impact of correctional facilities' efforts to derail gang associations in prison would have been more consistent with the editors' goal of providing information on the criminal justice system's response to the gang problem.

The final section entitled, "Setting Gang Policy," offers two interesting discussions of general issues pertaining to the task of framing a response to the gang problem. Ebensene's article, "A National Gang Strategy" reminds the reader that many gang members are delinquent before they become associated with gangs and that concerns with gang suppression should not supplant efforts to implement effective delinquency intervention and prevention strategies. He redirects the attention of those concerned with framing appropriate responses to gang behavior to the longitudinal studies of delinquency and drug abuse which identify opportunities for constructive prevention and intervention efforts in early childhood. He decries the repetitive cycle of punitive and rehabilitative strategies and urges development of a national gang strategy not as a solution but as a reminder that there is no quick fix on the horizon. The final article by Ira Sharkansky clearly and cogently articulates the difficulties associated with formulating social policy with regard to gangs. He illustrates through comparisons with other difficult issues the complexity of the gang problem, the susceptibility of this issue to political haymaking and demagoguery and the reality that some approaches, for example gun control, massive economic restructuring or drug legalization, are simply off-limits in the foreseeable future. These two essays, rather than concluding the volume, would have better served to introduce essays which picked up the threads of their arguments and examined the applicability of research on such efforts as parent training programs, school based violence prevention programs, aggressive efforts to limit access of juveniles to guns, collaborations between schools and law enforcement agencies and correctional strategies to foster prosocial norms and activities to the prevention or reduction of gang-related crime.

Corrections in the United States is in serious trouble. As of July 1995, state prison populations exceeded one million inmates, while Federal prisons held close to 100,000 prisoners. On any given day, the nation's jails hold more than half a million adults. Many are dangerously overcrowded. Recent data compiled by the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics reflect an incarceration rate of 400 state and federal prisoners per 100,000 US residents, setting yet another ignominious benchmark for the country. This emphasis on incarceration has come at great cost to American taxpayers. Today, correctional expenditures represent the fastest growing item in state budgets, outstripping education, welfare, and related government responsibilities. Yet inspite of the huge outlays associated with incarceration, the crime control effects directly attributable to imprisonment are inconsistent or modest at best with crime rates remaining at acceptably high levels.

Given today's preoccupation with deterrence, punishment and imprisonment as the predominant responses to the nation's crime problem, Ted Palmer's new book A Profile of Correctional Effectiveness and New Directions for Research provides a veritable breath of fresh air, in a number of ways. First, in today's justice environment, where the vast majority of policy makers, practitioners and scholars subscribe to the view that correctional intervention programs do not work, the book offers persuasive evidence to the contrary. By carefully reviewing more than two dozen meta-analyses and literature reviews of many intervention programs, the volume offers a consistent picture of the effectiveness of correctional interventions. Second, at a time when corrections seems to have run out of new ideas, the book invites us to take a fresh look at research and delineates exciting and new approaches for the evaluation of intervention programs. Rather than cursorily diagnose corrections' needs and call for change, the book provides a thoughtful blueprint for the design of advanced research studies. As such, Palmer introduces not only new and more sophisticated analytic techniques, but also offers specific research procedures by delineating a range of critical variables for analyzing complex and multifaceted rehabilitation programs. To be sure, those looking for magic bullets or facile solutions, will not find them. This is clearly a scholarly effort designed to advance our state of knowledge in corrections.

Ted Palmer knows corrections. As senior researcher at the California Youth Authority he has produced landmark studies on the treatment and rehabilitation of juveniles offenders. Had his research and the many successes he so carefully documented been heeded, corrections might not be in the quagmire it is in today. How did we get to our current dismal state?

The answer to this question is traceable to the early-1970s, when rehabilitation, deinstitutionalization and community-based corrections were the currency of the day among practitioners and academicians alike. In 1971, the American Friends Service Committee published Struggle for Justice, pointing to the many inequities inflicted on offenders (particularly minorities) by the criminal justice system. In quick succession, judicial discretion, sentencing practices, and capricious parole decisions became targets of withering criticism. But for the purposes of this review, the greatest contempt from both the right and the left of the political spectrum was reserved for the concept of rehabilitation. The year 1974 turned into a watershed for corrections. That year, the crime rate showed huge increases in the nation's crime rate. With Watergate receding, the public media rediscovered crime. Politicians, officials and the public began demanding that more criminals be put behind bars for longer periods of time. Rehabilitation was considered a farce and a myth.

The combined effects of the attack on rehabilitation, the criticism of an unjust system, and the clarion call for swift, certain, and severe punishment of offenders might not have had such an impact, had they not also coincided with the 1974 publication of an article by Robert Martinson in The Public Interest, which stated unequivocally that rehabilitative efforts had no appreciable effect on recidivism, with few and isolated exceptions (2). Hard-liners received additional reinforcement from a number of scholars who published in quick succession. Among them were Norval Morris, Ernest van den Haag, David Fogel, James Q. Wilson's, and Andrew von Hirsch.

In quick succession, incapacitation and the abolition of parole became the focal points for corrections reform, and set the stage for today's correctional dilemmas. Ted Palmer, to his everlasting credit, opposed the tidal wave of criticism that would engulf corrections and change its face for more than two decades. Opposing prevailing orthodoxies requires courage and considerable intestinal fortitude. Ted Palmer has both. It was correction's misfortune that Palmer's reanalysis of Martinson's study and presentation of empirical support for the effectiveness of rehabilitation never did receive the attention it deserved. Given the field's current sorry state, his book should receive the widest possible dissemination for several reasons. First, we cannot solve the nation's crime problem by prison construction alone. Palmer's book provides the necessary guidelines for identifying effective intervention strategies and developing alternatives to incarceration. And it does so without endangering public safety. Second, the high costs of prison construction and incarceration will force the criminal justice system to seek alternative options. And when that happens, the field may be ready to accept Palmer's precepts and begin using scientifically grounded programmatic experiments whose design warrants confidence in their findings.

A Profile of Correctional Effectiveness consists of twelve chapters and ten appendices. The first 5 chapters (Part I) present the best overview available to date on correctional effectiveness. This information will be of great interest to practitioners and scholars alike. Individual chapters analyze the differing ways meta-analyses and literature reviews summarize and integrate information; the methods used in the integration of the data and how authors organize their analytic approaches by "type" of intervention. There is a good synopsis of "what works" in corrections, by focusing on the findings and conclusions of some of the best analyses for correctional intervention overall and individually. Recidivism is discussed, as are problem areas and factors limiting current research approaches. Finally, there is a description of the multidimensional nature of intervention approaches, a fact rarely recognized or accounted for in existing research. The next 5 chapters (Part II) identify new directions for intervention research. This segment will be primary interest to researchers. It notes that progress in evaluation research will only come from studying the combination of features that comprise programs activities. There is also a thorough discussion of the nature, scope, and initial challenges involved in the new approach to research, as well as a persuasive presentation of the needs and issues involved in increasing the quality, strength, and relevance of studies. Specific analytic units are introduced that are capable of providing a foundation for more accurate descriptions and better understanding of interventions than have been accomplished thus far. Two chapters introduce the reader to two new analytical approaches: the "building-block" technique and the "global" approach. The first is well suited for identifying contributing features and combinations of features in intervention programs. The "global" model is a holistic yet systematic approach for identifying key features of effective programs. Palmer carefully describes specific procedures for implementing both and discusses issues of reliability, generalizability as well as limitations. The final two chapters focus on a variety of conceptual and technical issues. Appendices A through K will be of interest to readers wishing to round off their knowledge in areas of their special interest. For example, there are good discussions of such salient issues as control programs, sample size, definitions, and statistical significance among others.

In summary, this book is a carefully crafted, technical book on evaluation research in corrections. If heeded, it has the capacity to move corrections from its current quagmire to a more productive plane. Given the author's life work for the California Youth Authority, the book focuses on evaluations of programs for juveniles and adolescents. This in no way detracts from the key messages and lessons of the book discussed above. Although the book makes for some heavy, close-packed reading, it is a gem and should be read by policy makers and practitioners wishing to understand corrections and by anyone involved in evaluative research.

2. The fact that Martinson's work did identify some intervention programs that worked was largely ignored. Martinson later recanted. Unfortunately, his retractions never received the high level of publicity that accompanied his earlier attacks.

ORAL HISTORY PROJECT

The goal of the Oral History Project is to document the development of the field of criminology and criminal justice, through the words and writings of its founders, their students, and key innovators in the field. The project has received start up funds from ASC, ACJS, and Rutgers University. Additional funds will be sought from various granting agencies and organizations as the project progresses. Oral history materials will be housed in the World Wide Criminal Justice Library located at Rutgers University.

The project staff consists of Frank Taylor (Robbins), director and Tamryn J. Etten, assistant director. They will carry out the following activities over the next two years:

- Survey scholars to identify candidates for videotaped interviews.
- Coordinate and conduct interviews with nominated scholars.
- Draft proposals for project funding which include a program plan with project goals and objectives, target dates for task completion, and budget information.
- Create a homepage on the World Wide Web for easy access by Internet users.
- Solicit the participation of organizations and institutions which share a common commitment to the study of criminology and criminal justice in an Oral History Consortium. Consortium members will become funding partners and overseers of the Oral History Project.

Scholars will be selected for videotaped interviews through a series of peer nominations. A sample of scholars in the field will be surveyed and asked to nominate people whom they believe have made a significant contribution to the field of criminology and criminal justice. Nominees will be reviewed and approved by the advisory committee and project staff. Events such as seminars, presentations and speeches will be selected for videotaping based on nominations from advisory committee members and other scholars in the field.

FY 1996 Funding Finally Set; 1997 Proposed

Ending months of gridlock and government shutdowns, Congress and the President agreed in April on final Fiscal Year 1996 appropriations. The National Institute of Justice received $30 million, an increase of $4 million over FY 1995 that is slated for NIJ's less-than-lethal technology programs. The Bureau of Justice Statistics will receive $21.4 million, the same as FY 1995. The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention's final appropriation was $144 million.

These three agencies are likely to receive additional funding for FY 1996 and beyond as the result of provisions, similar to those initiated by COSSA, in the bill's Local Law Enforcement Block Grants. Under the act, up to three percent of the grants ($503 million in FY 1996) can be given to the Attorney General for research, evaluation, and data collection activities, as well as administrative costs, relating to programs supported by the block grants. It is unclear how much money will go toward research and data efforts.

For Fiscal Year 1997, which begins on October 1, President Clinton has requested $41 million for NIJ, $23 million for BJS, and $145 million for OJJDP. The significant increase is for NIJ is targeted for its technology programs.

Senate Panel Approves Bill Hindering Research on Minors

On April 18 the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee approved legislation that social science advocates say will severely hinder research involving miners. The bill now moves to the Senate floor.

The legislation, the Family Privacy and Protection Act (H.R. 1271), which would require prior written consent from a parent before a minor can participate in federally-sponsored research, was approved on a 7-5, party-line vote. A component of the GOP's Contract with America, it was approved by the full House, 418-7, last year.

The bill is opposed by both the Clinton administration and a broad coalition of science, education, and social policy groups. A lengthy article in the May 19 New York Times discussed the impact it would have on studies of youth drug use.

House NSF Bill Threatens SBE Directorate

House-passed legislation to reauthorize the National Science Foundation calls upon NSF Director Neal Lane to reduce the number of directorates by one. While the bill does not specify which one, a House Science Committee report accompanying the bill suggests it be the Social, Behavioral, and Economic Science Directorate. The report termed SBE research "of lower scientific priority" and recommends these programs be integrated into the rest of the Foundation's activities. Panel Democrats issued a dissenting report, lauding the contributions of these disciplines to the nation.

The bill was adopted by the House on May 30, but observers say it is unlikely the Senate will take up a similar bill before the end of this session of Congress.

CDC Firearms Research Defended

The Director of the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control (NCIPC) at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention defended firearms-related research funded by the CDC at a recent House Appropriations Committee hearing.

Mark Rosenberg responded to a barrage of questions from several Republicans on the panel who feel that NCIPC's firearms research appears driven by political goals rather than unbiased scientific inquiry. NCIPC came under similar scrutiny during last year's appropriations hearings in the Senate. Rosenberg emphasized that violence is a critical public health problem "even though the science leads to controversy." NCIPC and the research it funds is not anti-gun, owner/law-abiding citizen, emphasized Rosenberg.

Rep. John Porter (R-IL), chairman of the subcommittee overseeing CDC funding, inquired whether NCIPC would release the data of researcher Arthur Kellerman, director of Emory University's Center for Injury Control, whose research has attracted the wrath of the National Rifle Association. The NRA has targeted not only CDC's research on firearms, but has lobbied Congress to abolish the entire NCIPC. Rosenberg said that Kellerman has agreed to make the data available once he has completed his study.

Congress Takes Critical Look at Juvenile Justice Office

Recent congressional hearings on the reauthorization of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) have included examinations on the federal role in efforts to prevent youth violence.

OJJDP has a small research component, but primarily provides various formula and discretionary grants. Many Republicans in Congress have called for turning the office's programs over to the states in the form of block grants. Critics of the federal effort in this area cite burdensome mandates placed upon states and localities, as well as a frustration over the inability to stop the rising tide of youth violence.

At a recent Senate hearing, Sen. Fred Thompson (R-TN), chair of the Subcommittee on Youth Violence, bemoaned that OJJDP "has spent more than a million dollars over the past 22 years in efforts to prevent youth violence" yet the problem has skyrocketed and "we seem to have little to show for all the prevention money that has been spent except ... for all those mandates."

Sen. Joseph Biden (D-DE), the Ranking Democrat on the panel, said the "bulk of the funding" at OJJDP should go to research. He opposed block grants, but also said that the status quo was not working. "We need new research for new problems ... the problem is we've run out of information," Biden said. He said that states were unlikely to undertake research and evaluation projects on their own, and that it is an inherent federal responsibility.

COSSA Testifies in Support of Justice Research and Statistics

Felice J. Levine, Executive Officer of the American Sociological Association testified on behalf of COSSA before a key House panel in support of the research and statistics program of the Justice Department.

She noted that while support for NIJ's DNA and less-than-lethal technology programs has increased considerably in recent years, NIJ funding for social science research has been stagnant. She urged a more balanced approach, one that better includes the insights of the social and behavioral sciences. Levine also praised BJS' important measurements of crime and justice, but said resources do not allow it to address the many statistical needs of our justice system.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE BOARD
Atlanta, Georgia
April 26 & 27, 1996

The Midyear Executive Board Meeting was convened by President Charles Wellford at 7:45 pm on the evening of April 26th. In his Presidential Report, Wellford noted several items of interest for ASC members. OBSSR at NIH has asked for comments on their definition of behavioral and social science. Felice Levine, in recent COSSA testimony before Congress, advocated greater research support for the social sciences. Julie Horney responded to the CDCP plan for a statistical system on Domestic Violence. The ASC-ACJS Oral Histories Project is moving forward. Chris Eskridge, Treasurer, reported that the ASC office has been fitted with new equipment. In his Advertising Report, Eskridge noted that ASC earned $8,000 from Advertising revenues from the Boston Meeting and that given the superb exhibit hall in Chicago, the earnings potential is excellent for this year’s meeting. In other committee reports: (1) The ASC/ACJS Ad Hoc Committee on Criminal Justice Education will seek information from Criminal Justice Programs to assess program characteristics and needs. (2) A subcommittee will be put together from the Ad Hoc Committee on the Future of the ASC to examine growth in ASC services. Suggestions for the committee include investigating the kinds and extent of services offered by comparable national and regional organizations and administering a survey to participants at the Town Hall Meeting in Chicago. (3) Marcia Chaiken emphasized the importance of getting members to attend the Town Hall Meeting to get participant feedback. John Laub offered to tape record and transcribe the meeting. (4) The ASC has a new policy for Criminology reprints. The ASC will charge $10.00 for reprinting a single page, passage of 300 words or more, a table, or a figure. A one time charge of $50.00 will be assessed for reprinting an article. Author’s permission to reprint will be required, but they will not receive any of the reprint fee. Requests for CD-Rom reprints will be treated similarly. ASC will sign a Carl Contract in order to receive royalties for articles downloaded from the Carl System. (5) A breakfast or lunch will be scheduled in Chicago for all current and past members of the Criminology Editorial Board during Charles Tittle’s tenure. (6) Candidates for Affirmative Action student fellowships, ASC Awards, and ASC Fellows were announced and recipients approved by the Board. (7) The Policy Committee will take up the Women’s Division’s resolution on Decarceration by the November meeting. (8) The 2001 meeting will be scheduled for the Atlanta Marriott Marquis. St. Louis, Chicago, and New Orleans are possible meeting sites for 2002. (9) The 1996 Program is likely to have 400 panels, with 20 running concurrently. Among the Plenary sessions scheduled is one commemorating the 20th Anniversary of the Women’s Division. Registration fees will be raised by $5.00 for regular members and non-members. There will be no increase for student members. (10) The ASC Homepage with about 10 search engines will be up and running very soon.
